THE WIRELESS TELEGRAPH So far as yet known, the collision between the steamships Republic and Florida, was unavoidable. Both vessels were proceeding with due precautions through a dense fog and neither knew of the other's proximity until they came together. There is a vague intimation that the Florida was not in the so-called "inward bound lane and was seeking it, which would account

The collision has proved the great value of the water-tight compartment system. Without it, the Republic with it, the vessel remained afloat an abundant time for the rescue of all the passengers. But the value of this system had been proved on previous occasions, and a fresh demonstration was not needed.

for the collision at practically right

It was, however, the value of wireless telegraph which proved itself beyond all possibility of question. Within ten minutes, the operator on the Republic succeeded in notifying a shore spring and the near approach of the station of the vessel's danger, and the same signal was caught by several steamships within 150 to 200 miles, all of which hastened at once to the res-But for the prompt notification by wireless, the rescuing vessels might not have arrived in time, for the Republic eventually sank and the Floride, badly overloaded and also with her bow seriously crushed, might not have reached port safely in which events the loss of life would have been heavy.

The wireless telegraph system is entitled to great credit, and its installa- ly attended. tion on at least all passenger-carrying steamships should be made obligatory.
